Tags The Federal Reserve is trying to make us all believe that "too-big-to-fail" banks are like the way we've always done business. Money creation as payment for bad debts is not a new idea, but it has been rare as long as banks have been around. But the U.S. government has encouraged banks to do it for years. Today in the form of the Fed, banks are allowed to create money when they lend money or make loans. The government gives banks the ability to create money. The banks, in turn, create money for their benefit. In the "banking model," the banks create money and keep the money. When they lend the money to others, they can then keep the money as a return on the loan. This is how our banking model is supposed to work — without government intervention. The Federal Reserve and other central banks didn't just create money in order to keep the banks afloat. They do so to pay for other services. For example, as the Fed has grown larger and larger over the years, it has been given more responsibilities. The Federal Reserve, as currently structured, should be focused on maintaining the value of the currency, and not on trying to help banks. When the government does have to bail out a large bank, it is not due to lack of regulation — it is because of market pressures. Market pressures include banks creating money because that's what they've been taught to do. Since banks create money to loan, this forces them to compete for business. There's nothing wrong with this — as long as they are privately owned. But if a bank is a government institution, it is more-or-less compelled to lend the money to other people, so it can keep the money it created. This is how the government creates money and gets "free" money. Here's how we know this: The federal government has created some $4.2 trillion in f678ea9f9e
